

Epidemic diseases and their reminders in the City of Leuven

2020-12-01

A few places in Leuven remind us of the fact that there have been epidemics in the city:

At the municipal cemetery there is a monument to remember the Leuven victims of the 19th-century cholera epidemic. It's a cast-iron cross with the names of streets who were most affected.

In the 19th century there were several large outbreaks of cholera epidemics in Europe. Cholera is an infectious bacterial disease caused by a bacterium that was transmitted through contaminated water.

Characteristics are: vomiting, an explosive diarrhea and dehydration. Today, properly treated, most of the patients do recover. But in the 19th century there was a very high mortality rate (almost 50% died). The cause was unknown for a long time and the so-called "blue death" (from the disease the skin got a strange blue color) has been compared with the "black death" (the plague) in the past centuries.

In Leuven the 3 great cholera epidemics caused about 1000 deaths. The worst year was 1849 with 577 victims. Mostly in the poor, densely populated neighbourhoods around the small river "de Voer", which was during the summer an open sewer.

The memorial was placed 150 years after the first epidemic and exudes simplicity: an earthen tumulus with metal crosses, like they use to place on humble, ordinary people's graves. The names of the deceased were written with paint: soon the names became unreadably, due to the rain showers.

The design of the monument strengthens the charges on the corresponding sign: "the deadly victims were eminently poor people, from who the individual personality was found 'unimportant'".

Saint-Quentin's Church

Here you can find the painting "The plague procession to Bas-Wavre". This procession took place for the first time in 1651. That year there was a plague epidemic in Leuven. The priest of the Saint-Quentin's Church, father Buyckx, was one of the first victims. After he had prayed to Our Lady of Neerwaver he was healed and his parish would have suffered less compared to other parishes. A miracle! In return the parish started with a yearly procession, which was organised on the 5th Sunday after Easter.

Plaque at the house in Schapenstraat

Close to the Saint-Quentin's Church, in the Schaapenstraat, you can find a large house, built in order of the ladies Maria and Margerita La Mistan of Neerwaver. On the house is a plaque with a reliquary of Our Lady of Neerwaver. Below you, can read the inscription: "van de pest, oorlog en dieren tyd - verlos ons Maria van Pys" (From the plague, war and hard times, free us Maria van Pys).

Terbank

Nowadays there is a school. But in the Middle Ages there was a hospital for lepers. It was definitively founded by Hendrik I, duc of Brabant and it was close to Leuven, outside the Brusselse Poort (gate to Brussels). According to some historians the hospital already existed in 1197. There worked: 9 friars, 9 nuns, and as determined by Pope Honorius III in his letter from January 20, 1223, the abbot of Villers was their spiritual director and leader.

At the beginning of the year 1300 the friars left Terbank and only the nuns remained. In 1578 the monastery was burned down by Burgundian soldiers who fought under Jan from Austria.

In 1604 the nuns could return to the monastery but, once again, in 1635, there was a lot of damage due to the Siege of the city of Leuven. At the middle of the 17th century, the monastery was rebuilt. But April 26, 1783, the priory of Terbank was abolished by emperor Josef II. The monastery was sold, on January 22, 1787 and a little later the church was demolished.

The nuns came back two times: in 1792 and in 1795. But they were chased away by the French, November 23, 1796.

The Cellebroeders (Cellfriars) appeared in Leuven in 1345 and they lived in a few cells. Hence their name 'Cellebroeders' or Cellfriars. They were working at the Saint-Jacobs' parish and they had a triple task: take care of the plague victims, receive people who suffer from mental illness and bury the dead.

The city council paid them for their work. Over time you could find the Cellfriars all around the Roman-German empire. In 1458 their congregation was officially recognized by Pope Pius II.

The Cellfriars buried all the dead from the Black Death in 1578. The city gave their authorization to bury the dead at the municipal cemeteries, so not only at the cemetery around Saint-Jacobs' Church.

You could identify the Cellfriars by their black habit. They also buried the dead pilgrims who died of the plague in the pilgrims' house in Winksele.

Painting in Saint-Jacobs' Church

Cellfriars are burying the dead close to the Saint-Jacob's Church. They died during the plague-epidemic in the 16th century.